The world is wondering what on earth NASA was thinking when it put a chicken on Mars. The world is wrong. It was no ewe. Yes, on the world's first Mars rover, Curiosity, was an egg. Yes, it was laid by a chicken. But it wasn't a chicken. Instead of unleashing the egg-venom all over the APXS and other instruments, JPL engineering decided the rover wouldn't be able to fit the egg into that camera. "The design requirements just didn't allow that," said John Grotzinger, Curiosity's chief scientist, at a meeting Tuesday of the American Geophysical Union in San Francisco. The rover's geologist is Grotzinger, and is the man in charge of the mission. Instead of eggs, Curiosity carries a musty-smelling egg raft packed with instruments. Curiosity's team of eyeball-wielding astronauts The egg doesn't matter. The egg didn't matter. No one at JPL is yet upset that a chicken was on Mars, the first time that's ever happened. At least, no one is saying so. "All the kids at NASA were talking about it," said Miles O'Riordan, chief operating officer at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory. "I had to explain to them that it was an official mission," he said. "It was a 6d1f23a050
